Studies of Jews in Society

Series Ed.: H. Hartman

This book series focuses on social scientific studies of Jewry. It highlights contrasts and diversity between different manifestations of Jewry and the ways in which Jews and Jewry bridge the gap between these diversities. It also examines the ways in which they connect to the wider contexts in which Jews and Jewry are found. The volumes in the series deal with such topics as: national or religious orientations, religious and secular divides, denominational differences, historical changes urban-suburban-rural divides, and immigrant versus native (i.e. internal or international migration). Moreover, the series presents comparisons of different modes of research and analysis, including quantitative versus qualitative studies of Jews, and local versus national versus global studies of Jews. Taking a broad perspective on “social science”, the series studies the aspects of Jewry from a range of disciplines, such as anthropology, communications, demography, economics, education, ethnography, geography, history, politics, social psychology, and sociology. In addition, it presents interdisciplinary studies among these fields, or between these fields and a related one.

This series:

- Is the only book series that is entirely devoted to the broad social scientific study of Jewry.
- Focuses on contrasting the diversities of Jewry in their many manifestations.
- Contributes greatly to the understanding of Jews in society.
- Addresses methodological aspects of social scientific research.
